A Qualitative Study on the Effectiveness of Treatment based on Holistic Needs of Secondary School Students with Dyslexia

The study is aimed at conducting qualitative research interviews with secondary school students with dyslexia through designing a customised framework for the holistic development of such students according to the results of therapeutic groups for them. The team of researchers conducted 105 rounds of interviews with dyslexic secondary school students, their families and teachers in the Shatin, Ma On Shan and Kowloon City areas. Findings of the study facilitated the understanding of service units towards the needs of such students in areas including learning, socialisation, and psychological support, paving the way for the structured development of relevant services.
